Many suburban school districts, based on 2020 New Jersey Department of Education data, are at or near reflecting the racial, ethnic, and social demographics of the state. Places like Woodbridge, Hamilton in Mercer County, Deptford, and Galloway and Egg Harbor Township almost mirror the racial and ethnic makeup of school children across New Jersey. They are not perfectly integrated, but they have the potential to become models of diversity and inclusion if state policies, like a stronger pro-integration school funding formula, supports and helps them better achieve full integration of opportunity at the school, classroom, and curriculum level. And we have an array of lessons learned and best practices to draw from with our many diverse and historically integrated school districts such as Montclair, South Orange / Maplewood, Teaneck, and Highland Park that have bravely led on this issue over the decades.
